a child who feels himself perfectly well, and most children with perifocal infiltrations complain after the first two or three weeks of nothing more than cough.

Secondly, in an institution the patient can be shielded from intercurrent infections, such as measles and pertussis, which predispose particularly to activating the disease.

Thirdly, the patient can be removed from possible contact with sources of infection and so protected from superinfection with tubercle bacilli, which is actually the most prolific cause of the grave forms of tuberculosis in childhood.

Fourthly, the child can be prevented from itself becoming a source of infection for other children. The gravity of this factor is uncertain. Since bacilli can be found in the (swallowed) sputum of quite small children with perifocal infiltrations, these patients can, theoretically, spread the disease by coughing. They can therefore infect other children.

Against sanatorium treatment can be set two objections. The first is that the children may become "institutionalized." The second is the stigma attaching to the word "sanatorium." The advantages considerably outweigh the disadvantages.

No surgical treatment is required for perifocal infiltrations. Artificial pneumothorax has been tried extensively on the continent but has been abandoned. There is no indication for its use. Gold salts, valuable in certain cases of phthisis in adults, are absolutely contraindicated in the highly reactive state of the body which conditions the appearance of perifocal infiltrations.

Symptomatic treatment should be applied according to the requirements of each case.

Prophylaxis.

The problem of prophylaxis of perifocal infiltrations is that of the prophylaxis of tuberculosis. Control of cases of "open" phthisis, and systematic examination of contact children, using the tuberculin test and X-rays, are the principal means at our disposal. Unfortunately, it must be said that the thoroughness with which these means are used often leaves much to be desired.
