A MANUAL OF RADIOLOGICAL DIAGNOSIS

for Students and General Practitioners.

By IVAN G. G. TCHAPEROFF, M.A., M.D., D.M.R.E. With a foreword by PHILIP H. MITCHNER, M.D., M.S., F.R.C.S. W. Heffer & Sons, Ltd., Cambridge. 1937. Price £1. 1s.

To the general practitioner who has not the daily experience of the hospital physician in the examination and reading of X-ray films a book such as the above will be of great value. The volume consists of some 285 plates of X-ray pictures of normal and pathological anatomy of the different regions of the body with sufficient letterpress to render the illustrations intelligible. We feel that a truer and at any rate a more descriptive title would have been "An Atlas of Radiology," which would have put it in a class more or less by itself. The selection of the conditions for illustration for the purposes of the general practitioner has been wise, but we regret that they have been reproduced as negatives rather than as positives as is the usual custom. No doubt the author did this deliberately with the intention of rendering the appearances exactly as they are seen in the X-ray film, but to our mind this gain is more than counterbalanced by the loss of detail sustained through the extra manipulations which are necessary in the process.

"History of Modern Morals." By Max Hodann. Our contemporary customs in actual life and our ideas as to what conduct is admirable or tolerable or neither, differ from the customs and ideas of our grandparents, in the most intimate and important relationships. This concise summary by a pioneer of public health work, traces the growth of knowledge and the consequent changes in opinions and institutions. Dr. Hodann knows the economic conditions of all Europe, and the latest conclusions in medicine and psychology. He writes most clearly and directly, with deep human sympathy and shrewd humour. His subject-matter includes heredity, eugenics, marriage, divorce, the problems of prostitution, birth control, sterilisation, abortion, sex education and the emergence of a new positive ethics.
